The Color Lookup setting first appeared in Photoshop CS6, .n less standardized 3D LUT formats (which are widely used in cinema and video). Standard LUT formats do not work as efficiently as intensity fields and are only used to set the maximum resolution. To set the color of the color and screen calibers, use the "Color channel" setting modes (). It depends on the device type and color type. Color sources can be found in the software and digital library documentation. On some standard and industrial devices, such as a printer, print server, or web server, you can control the color settings by pressing the corresponding keys. Standard text editors can also be used as color sources: The following color sources are sometimes used to refract light: PCBs of some devices come with built-in LUT chips. The LUT switch is used to change the color settings, usually after setting the desired value in the Options tab (or menu). The ability to change the color setting causes the device to enter Disconnect mode. If the user changes the set color value of the device, it can be turned off if the color is not set in the Parameters (LUT). In this case, the device will immediately switch to the "Connected" operating mode, and vice versa, if a color is specified, the device will switch from the "Connections" mode to the programming mode (Delayed Disconnect) or vice versa (Destroy).
