Recent search results for the term: Stream Torrent reviews Review of Stream Torrent Ace Stream Media is very easy to set up, and there's a large selection of all kinds of formats. The downside is that they all use fixed bitrates, and you can't select which ones you want. Three years ago, the Royal Society of London was concerned by growing reports that the British public might be losing faith in science. There were accusations that climate science was being politicised and denials that there was any link between vaccines and autism. The response of the Royal Society was to publish a report saying that society needed to do more to promote science. It felt like a clear-cut moral case to tackle the decline of faith in science. But more than three years later the report still seems to be a classic case of where the best intentions go wrong. The report does acknowledge that public faith in science has been waning since the 1980s, but says the causes for this are complex and obscure. It makes no judgment on the causes, but says that society needs to do more to promote "a societal culture in which science and scientific methods are seen as credible, trustworthy, or desirable". It sets out to do this by making recommendations on education, publishing and the media. The report is a clear case of why you shouldn't have the heads of society producing a report on one subject without any plan for follow-up. In this case, the Royal Society had no strategy for measuring the success of its recommendations or for giving an account of whether they were making a difference. It did not assess whether the Society was achieving its own stated aim of promoting science and scientific methods. The report has all the problems of the process that produced it. It was published in May last year, but there was no consultation with members or with the public before it was produced. It was the subject of no media coverage. And there was no published assessment of the report's impact. The assessment of its findings was included in the "A Vision for Science" report published this year but only after it was too late to make any changes to the original recommendations. How science has been politicised The report has many recommendations. But perhaps the most important is that the Society should have a role in promoting science in society and in the media. It should "publish up-to-date guidance on the use of scientific
