Stadler bannet Stadler bannet (pronounced ; Standardized German for 'stapler' or 'stapler bureau'), is a Swiss method of printing multiple copies of books and magazines that is based on printing and placing newspaper inserts, or staplers, between the pages of individual copies of the publication. Stadler bannet is still widely used in Germany, Austria, and Switzerland. It was the principal method used for production of German newspapers and magazines until the rise of the offset printing process. Today, Stapler bannet prints newspapers and magazines for distribution as inserts in magazines, and they are also an independent option in the production of audiovisual media (video, music albums, etc.). Process A printed page in a book is composed of three sections: the printed text on the right side, the text on the left side, and the background color in the space between. Because of the typical construction of magazines, some magazines have the printed text on both sides. The paper used for this technique is generally white, and typically is not folded, although it can be used in the bookbinding process. The publisher will buy a set of newspapers, usually daily newspapers, and decide how many copies of the publication to include the inserts. Each copy of the publication will be wrapped in paper, and the inserted sheets will be placed inside the wrapping and tied with glue to create a book-like product. Benefits Stadler b 0cc13bf012
