Various one-way clutch assemblies for a motor vehicle have heretofore been provided and some of them are already known to be installed in the engine compartment of a motor vehicle. The one-way clutch assemblies of this type have usually been employed to take up the kinetic energy generated when the driver of a motor vehicle abruptly steps on an accelerator pedal for the acceleration of the motor vehicle. However, with the prior art one-way clutch assemblies, it is difficult to mount the one-way clutch assembly in the engine compartment of a motor vehicle in a manner to prevent formation of a gap between the one-way clutch assembly and an inner surface of a casing of the engine compartment and the one-way clutch assembly should be installed in the engine compartment with a high degree of positional accuracy. Japanese Patent Unexamined Publication No. 61-149945, corresponding to U.S. Pat. No. 4,542,721, issued on Sept. 24, 1985, discloses a one-way clutch assembly for a motor vehicle which is constructed so as to employ a pair of C-shaped bearing blocks for preventing axial movement of an inner race of a one-way clutch. Although this one-way clutch assembly can be mounted with a high degree of accuracy on an engine block of the motor vehicle, the C-shaped bearing blocks are expensive and there is a limit for reducing the weight of the one-way clutch assembly. Therefore, the one-way clutch assembly has a disadvantage that the bearing blocks must be replaced with a new one when the one-way clutch is worn or damaged due to the resulting increase in the weight of the one-way clutch assembly.
