something I've been thinking about for a while: the nature of space. I think this post is going to talk a little about the practical implications of what many philosophers have called “the problem of other minds” and “the problem of other minds” in the sense of: the problem of explaining communication between people who aren’t directly interacting, and with people who don’t even have conscious minds (maybe this is the wrong example, let me know if you think so!) I think that there are several different types of space, and I’ll talk about some of them. I would love to talk about some of these in great depth, but also do myself the disservice of trying to do so in an overly simplistic way. So please be patient with me if I don't do an awesome job of explaining these things! Spaciality There's the "spaciality" associated with how we feel things are "out there" in space.

What I mean by this is: our experience of space is largely spatially-related. In a sense, I think this is the way that most people implicitly "see" the world. When we say that something is "out there", I don't think we necessarily think of the thing as being in a specific place in space. It's hard for us to know "where exactly" something is, so we tend to take it for granted that it's "out there", and we connect it with other things “out there”. We experience things as
