Conduct your web searches in a quick and simple manner with Google Desktop Beta. Google Desktop Beta is an extension for Google Chrome that helps you do almost all of your web searching and online transaction in the simplest way possible. Of course, Google Desktop Beta comes with lots of useful features, but its main point of interest is the ability to search the web directly from your computer. With this extension, you can run simple searches from any field on any site, as well as save any search result on your computer or even share it with any web address. Advanced users will be glad to know that some more features are available, such as history and bookmarks, so they can quickly get back to any online web resource. On top of all these features, Google Desktop Beta seems to be a bit unstable at times, but you won't regret having it installed on your PC, as you'll get more freedom, better performance and numerous other benefits. Google Desktop Beta comes with a clean interface, so there's nothing overly complex, at least not on the first glance. There's a taskbar at the bottom that shows which extension is currently active, thus helping you get back to it anytime you're in need of it. The contents of each extension are shown on a separate panel, which, frankly speaking, requires a lot of time to find. There's also no way to directly filter results by date or by page, which forces you to spend more time with this extension. Another drawback is that Google Desktop Beta is not available for every web browser. If you decide to give this extension a try, keep in mind that it might affect computer performance, so you'll have to make sure that you're using the right Internet connection.
