In this phase the system condenses in the vortex state. Preparation In superconductors, "dipoles" can be created by a magnetic field. Typically, in this type of system, the magnetic field is applied along the ab axis of the material. As one oscillates the magnetic field, some of the particles will be in the orbit Because the system is slightly non-uniform, the oscillating magnetic field will cause the particles to move, creating small currents that induce a magnetic field. This oscillating field drives the system.
