The Navy's first four littoral combat ships (LCS) built for the service are expected to be delivered to the fleet by the end of the year. But a funding law passed by Congress in 2015 prohibits the Pentagon from spending funds on construction or delivery of the ships until the Defense Department submits a report to Congress on the program's management and cost overruns. "It is vital that we obtain a thorough review of the program and that all options are explored to avert failure of this program," Rep. Jackie Speier, D-Calif., chairwoman of the House Armed Services Seapower subcommittee, said in a statement Wednesday. ADVERTISEMENT Congressmen have been asking for a report on the program in the wake of the announcement of a $1.2 billion cost overrun on the first vessel. "Even though there was initially a need for 10 ships, it's possible we may only need five or six," Lt. Cmdr. Ben Ainslie, the lead acquisition manager for the LCS program, told reporters Wednesday. The LCS is a planned class of fast, shallow-draft warships designed to perform missions near shore. Developed in conjunction with the shipbuilder Austal USA, the four vessels are outfitted with a mission payload of guns and an array of sensors that can be used for surface, undersea and air operations. The first vessel, dubbed Freedom, is to be delivered to the Navy in December. The second vessel is currently in active service with the U.S. Navy, while the third and fourth are due to arrive in the fleet in the spring of 2017. While the first four vessels are primarily used to escort Navy warships, the last six are being designed to serve as a surface fleet logistics hub, providing ammo and food to the fleet's ships. Ainslie said that the current version of the LCS costs the government $245 million each. But the price is likely to

In the wake of a second near-meltdown for the United States financial sector, talks about how to regulate the banks have taken centre stage in the presidential campaign. Americans were shocked in October by the revelation that a US bank which may or may not have been the target of a botched attempt to smear the president, had lost $1.2bn on a $7bn bet it had made with a now defunct Russian bank. Now the US is considering how best to stop such losses happening again. The initial reaction was to call for a new law to bring in regulation comparable to that which existed in Europe. But, as New York Times economics correspondent David Wessel reminds us, there is nothing quite as draconian in Europe as the US system of treating financial institutions as quasi-public utilities. And that system isn't about to be reversed by a new law. What is needed in the US, then, is not a new law, but an efficient, resilient system that provides the correct incentives for bankers to behave responsibly. This is where it gets a little tricky. The most-often mentioned remedy is to make top-level banking executives personally liable for their firms' debts. It is quite fashionable among the left to criticise politicians for making deals with bankers. But in the case of the banking industry, where the consequences of failure are dire for the economy, that just isn't enough. You don't get to
